1. Stand out from the college competition

According to Research, only 9% of high school students use LinkedIn, meaning those who do have a better chance of standing out from their peers. In fact, social media experts are coaching students to create well thought-out profiles on LinkedIn and bringing them to the attention of college admissions officers. While there's no official spot to link to your profile on a college application, there's a good chance someone will look at it if you include it.

2. Set yourself up for career success

Think about it: Taking the time to craft a LinkedIn profile (even if your experience is light) tells a potential boss that you're serious about your future in the work force. LinkedIn is a unique social platform because it is designed specifically for professional networking. If you're looking for an internship or part-time job, LinkedIn has well over 1.5 million student jobs and internships up for grabs. And it's easy to search for specific companies, schools, or fields you're interested in.

3. Take control of your own online narrative

In 2013, LinkedIn lowered its minimum age requirement from 18 to 14. More and more high schools are now offering classes that teach students how to make the most of LinkedIn. LinkedIn gives students the power to post their skills and interests — something they're proud of and want colleges and potential employers to find.

4. Start professional networking early

When you connect to favourite teachers, coaches and mentors on LinkedIn, you make it easy for them to stay in touch and follow your progress. They can write better recommendations and continue to support you.
